It is essential to support patients during and after their treatment because people always need someone to understand their life situation.
Doctors and medical staff show empathy for the patients
In hard times, support of family members and other people means a lot to the patients and is even more important than the treatment itself.
Those who have experienced similar situations and problems always strive to support each other, they show empathy and keep in touch to help others in time of need.
However, society has long been afraid of the disease and tried to keep aloof from the sufferers.
How to avoid depression?
Good quality sleep, nutritious food, fresh air and exercise, and even quiet contemplation are necessary, but social contacts are no less important.
Positive attitude and understanding that the hardest time is over give a new impulse to aspire for the best, brightest, and happy moments in life!
